Visiting the El Salvadoran Refugee camp in Santa Rosa. Here we celebrated Mass with the community, and listened to the families' stories of political and human injustice. Relaying these stories is the only way the El Salvadorans can communicate their tragic experiences to the rest of the world.

Working with the Women's Group in Ocotepeque. We made really creative toys for the Guadalupe (the Day Care Center) using such common things as dried corn cobs, beans, tin cans, cardboard boxes, and material scraps. It was definitely a lesson in ingenuity and resourcefulness.

Me and my buddy Nieves.

One of our biggest projects was translating into Spanish the descriptions and directions of the medicine donated to the Casa de Maria by American physicians. The nuns running the Casa were very grateful as it prevented potentially serious misuse of the drugs. I was happy that, even in a small way, I made a difference and left my fingerprint in Guatemala.
